Trading patterns in Ireland

The environment of Ireland effects trading in various ways. Based on the fact that Ireland is surrounded by ocean on all sides helps the trading in one main way. There can be a clear pathway to any of the coasts in the country which makes other countries more willing to trade with them than some country in the middle of the continent. But, on the other hand there are a couple different mountain ranges which makes it a bit difficult for several different people. People within the country who would like to trade with other cities can't make their way around the mountains. Also, the large mountains can turn away countries around them making trade take longer. In conclusion, the environment makes it both harder and easier for trading.

Cultural Diffusion in Ireland

The physical environment of Ireland, such as the many rivers and the flat green farmlands affects the cultural diffusion in many different ways. First of all, the good farmlands brought settlers from South America from places like Chile and Peru. They brought crops like tobacco and one of Ireland's most celebrated food, potatoes. Second of all, their languages came from a couple different locations throughout the world. Their oldest language, Irish, obviously came from the native country whereas Gaelic came from Scottish settlers. But at this point the main language is English which came from the United Kingdom. All in all, the physical environment of Ireland affects the cultural diffusion in several different ways.

Economy in Ireland

The physical environment of Ireland affects the economy due to all the climate changes and the weather thusforth effecting farming and tourism. The rain is what affects the farming more than any other physical changing. For example, without the rain the crops get unhealthy and die which in turn would make the livestock sick because they didn't have anything to eat. So that would completely ruin the idea of having the economy based off of the farming. The occasional snow could also cause a lot of economic issues. A lot of tourists that go to Ireland, go to escape the immense amount of snow, so that could keep the amount of tourism down for that month or so. All in all, the physical environment has a big effect on the economy.
